

Barrister Ayesha Iqbal

Themis School of Law, University of London

These past few months have been a powerful reminder of how closely we humans are connected to each other and how our choices significantly determine our options for tomorrow. Tackling this deadly pandemic and its large scale impact on health, social and economic conditions should be the absolute priority of every nation and I am proud to state that Pakistan, a developing nation has taken noteworthy steps in dealing with the outbreak of this virus. However, various other world leaders should take note that COVID -19 is a universal challenge and it will only be resolved through responses that require unity and most importantly for conflict and violence to be set aside. World leaders blaming each other amidst this global health crisis is not in the best interest of any nation. This virus, much like terrorism has succeeded in creating a social, political and economic upheaval on a global level. The US-China conflict which threatens to explode in a war, the strain on the global health care systems and supply lines for medicines, ventilators and other critical medical equipment, the closure of borders, the cut throat competition for resources will all have drastic and devastating effects on local and global economy. Instead of calling the virus, “Chinese virus” and encouraging stigmatization along with launching smearing campaigns and vilification drives against nations for own personal gains, what the world needs to combat this deadly virus is global unity. Coordinated measures should be enforced by every nation with ultimate sense of urgent seriousness exhibiting unified trust and understanding. The world collectively should reinforce health care systems, strengthen community resilience and keep.